IN FOCUS: Whole-Of-Society Approach for Infectious Disease Prevention

In the past few weeks, countries have reported a gradual increase in the number of COVID-19 cases. This may be an indication of a new wave of infections. While social and economic activities have resumed in full swing across the globe, this development is a clear reminder that the pandemic is far from over. The strain of COVID-19 on healthcare systems is one many countries are yet to recover from, particularly countries like Nigeria that are concurrently responding to other infectious disease outbreaks.

A key lesson from the COVID-19 pandemic is the need for countries to be more proactive by continually building strong and resilient health systems that enhance preparedness and response to local and global public health events. Though the pandemic has provided opportunities to build back better, the burden of responding to other re-emerging diseases such as the Marburg virus disease is proof that the government cannot do it alone. Given the fact that no one, no country is immune to the effects of concurrent and in some cases, prolonged disease outbreaks, the Whole-of-society plays critical role in preventing, detecting, and controlling the spread of infectious diseases.

The government through its ministries, departments, and agencies, must continue to show political will and efficiently channel resources to strengthen health security. The pandemic has also shown that public-private partnerships, if well designed and implemented, can be a game changer for health services delivery. Civil Society, Community-Based, and Faith-Based Organisations have key roles to play in driving long-term health security.

Ultimately, every Nigerian must continue to take responsibility by adhering to preventive measures for infectious diseases as recommended by Nigeria Centre for Disease Control and other official authorities. Currently, Nigeria is on alert following the second incidence of Marburg virus disease detected in West Africa (read public health advisory here). Preventive measures such as regular handwashing not only help to prevent COVID-19 but other infectious diseases.
